Almost Half of Investors Expected the Market to Bounce Back

Investor responses to a survey in May and June reveal their expectations of the resiliency of the stock market.

Recently published analysis by the FINRA Investor Education Foundation and NORC at the University of Chicago revealed that almost half (47%) of respondents expected the market to get back to its January 2020 peak in the coming 12 months, and a quarter (26%) believed the market would get there within the next 12 months (see chart below).

Both retirement-only and taxable account investors whose portfolios had substantially decreased more frequently expected the market to improve in the next year: 64% of those with significant losses expected a comeback compared to 52% of those whose portfolios had not substantially decreased.

Another finding: just 11% of respondents said they were extremely or very confident that financial markets are fair to the average investor, and 33% were not at all or not very confident in markets' fairness.
