The Plight of Stocks When Bonds Offer a 'Paltry' Alternative

U.S. stocks have never gone into a crash with lower rates (see table in bottom right-hand corner), and this may be the simplest explanation why the stock market hasn't fallen further, according to a Wealth of Common Sense blog post last week.

The lack of an attractive alternative in government bonds or cash "has changed the incentives and risk equation" for investors including pension funds, endowments, foundations, sovereign wealth funds, family offices, highly paid corporate executives and wealthy individuals.

"Do you think all of those investors are going to sell their risk assets to move into government bonds or cash that's yielding nothing?" the post asked. At their highest, Treasuries paid an annual income of $108,000 on $1 million invested in 1980 versus paying a "paltry" $6,500 currently.

"Such low rates will likely lead to a market that doesn't always make sense," according to the post, given that investors have never navigated markets like this.
