WEEKLY HEADLINES

Expanded Trading Notwithstanding, Majority of Market Return Produced During Core Market Hours

Given that there are now more pre- and post-market trading hours than there are hours when the exchanges are officially open, Nasdaq Dorsey Wright recently sought to understand the contribution of the out-of-market-hours trading on the market's return. And, they wondered in this Advisor Perspectives post, "If we didn't have to worry about taxes or transaction costs, would we theoretically be better off not leaving exposure open during the off-market hours?"

The findings: the majority of the market movement still takes place during the core market hours.

The data suggests it makes sense to leave positions open overnight, the post concluded. See details in the table in the bottom right-hand corner.
