WEEKLY HEADLINES

What to Expect Starting a Year at a Market Top

"All-time highs tend to follow all-time highs." An excerpt from a Of Dollars and Data blog post last week, that's the essence of the analysis from several blogs commenting on equity investing as the S&P 500 closed 2020 at yet another all-time high. "All-time highs are a bullish indicator, at least in the near term," the post continued.

Data from JP Morgan shows that returns following all-time highs have been higher than average since 1988, according to the Real Returns blog (see chart below right). "The market actually spends quite a lot of time (around 40%) at, or near, all-time highs, so it isn't an exceptional event and really shouldn't affect your decision-making."

Of Dollars and Data also finds a performance premium of investing near all-time highs in international and emerging stock markets.
