WEEKLY HEADLINES

Is the Record Decline in the VIX a Positive Sign for Stocks?

What does last week's record 39% three-day decline in the VIX signal about the near-term future for equities? FundStrat analyzed the 40 largest three-day drops, and found that stocks were higher 87% of the time over the next six months, and 65% of the time over the next three months.

Similarly, Compound Advisors' Charlie Bilello thinks a steep drop in the VIX is a bullish sign, based on his analysis of the 20 largest seven-day declines. On average, the S&P 500 was up 1.76% six months later, and an average 11.44% one year later. The table in the bottom right-hand corner shows the results of the top five largest declines.

One "head fake" occurred in October and November of 2008, according to FundStrat. "If you believe this is 2008, then stocks are in trouble. But if you believe this is anything but 2008, the [recent sell-off] is done."
