WEEKLY HEADLINES

After Buying into the Volatility, Most Investors Either Made Money or Broke Even in 2020

The most common action investors took in response to last year's market volatility? Almost one out of two investors (45%) bought stocks. This was one of the primary findings of research conducted by The Motley Fool and released last week along with a slew of stories marking the one-year anniversary of the VIX hitting an all-time high of 82.69 on March 16, 2020.

One-third (32%) of surveyed investors said they sold stocks while another one-third (32%) said they kept money out of the market. About 21%—most pronounced among investors with 10 years or more experience and women—said they did nothing different.

While 85% of respondents said they'd experienced some anxiety about the market last year, 68% believed they either made money or broke even.

Across all demographics, the most popular reason to buy stocks was to capitalize on a fast-rising security. See the chart below right.
